

Rambling ED patient journey narration

The messy first-person narration from the demo, the kind of paragraph that comes out of your head when someone asks you to describe work you know cold.

Priya's narration (verbatim)

"So a patient walks in through the main ED doors, and usually the first thing that happens is a quick greeting at the front and they get put in line for triage. The triage nurse takes vitals and a brief history and assigns an acuity level, which decides how urgent they are. Then normally they go to registration to capture insurance and demographics, although if someone is really sick we skip that and register at the bedside later. Then they wait for a bed to open up, and honestly this is where most of the waiting happens, especially when the department is full and we are boarding admitted patients who have nowhere to go upstairs. Once they get a bed, a nurse does a fuller assessment, and then the physician finally sees them. After that come tests, labs, imaging, and we wait on results. Oh, and low acuity patients sometimes go down a separate fast track path to a quicker area. I forgot to mention that."

Notice the hallmarks of a real brain-dump: an out-of-order edge case tacked on at the end ("I forgot to mention that"), a step skipped and recovered (bedside registration), and an honest aside about where the real waiting happens.
