

The Brilliant Intern

Think of AI as a gifted new intern you must manage, teach, and double-check.

The Gifted Intern

The most useful way to picture current AI is a brilliant new intern your company just hired. They have read virtually every textbook on Earth, speak dozens of languages, type faster than you can think, never call in sick, and happily work twenty four hours a day. Having that at your fingertips feels like a superpower.

The Blind Spots

But this intern has glaring blind spots. They have never worked at your company, never met your customers, and are blind to your unwritten rules. They might know ten thousand pizza recipes but not that your oven runs hot on the left side. They also suffer complete amnesia, with zero memory between conversations, walking in fresh every new chat.

How To Use It

Manage this intern like any eager new hire. You are the boss. Assign work that fits their strengths, patiently teach them your business context every time, and carefully verify their output before sharing it. You take the credit when the work is excellent and the responsibility if there is a mistake.

Remember this

Treat AI like a brilliant intern, gifted and tireless, but new, contextless, and in need of a manager.
